Use of the radial artery for continuous blood gas monitoring in the postoperative patient. The radial artery was used as a monitor of arterial blood gases in 36 postoperative patients. The number of arterial blood gas analyses performed from the radial artery varied from one to nine per hour over the intraoperative and immediate postoperative period. The standard technique of insertion and attachment of a large skin blood sampling needle was used. The analysis of a sample of blood obtained with the blood gas needle from the radial artery was correlated ($r = .99$) with radial artery blood gases obtained at the same time by an arterial blood gas system. Blood was drawn from the radial artery without difficulty and the rate of blood flow varied from 3-4 ml per minute. The advantages of this new method of blood gas monitoring in the postoperative patient are presented.

Q: What is the reason for using "no data" error I am reading a famous book and the author says that using no data is a bad practice this statement says A no-data subroutine is a procedure that executes without first identifying a required dataset. The procedure may execute successfully or fail without having identified any rows of data to process. I have no idea why. Suppose I do not use a dataset, my understanding is that my query will only return 0 rows, which is a bad practice. What am I doing wrong? A: In VBA for MS Access you have a function called ExecuteNoData that takes no parameters. Presumably this is used to allow the user to report on information that wasn't found. For example, if you stored a table of customer information in a table called Customers, then you might have a report that lets a user see how many customers there are in the UK, and how many in Australia. The following pseudocode creates a report with this functionality: frmReport.lstCustomers AS i Select * from Customers Where Country = "UK" Or Country = "Australia" Order By CustomerId Where CustomerId >= 10 And CustomerId
