Related industries High frequency trading High frequency trading (HFT) is the practice of trading securities or other financial instruments using automated technology that integrates with the electronic market infrastructure. The central financial instruments that can be traded electronically are stocks, bonds, options, futures, and futures contracts. HFT attempts to detect and react to all market movements very quickly, to the nanosecond, using very large amounts of data. The basic premise behind HFT is to use mathematical and statistical means to extract information from vast amounts of data; the main challenge being that a computer has to process vast amounts of data extremely quickly and effectively. HFT algorithms have also been developed to deal with high-speed trading. High definition television High definition television (HDTV) is television programming of an HD resolution as opposed to the standard high-definition content for a standard definition television. This is most typically the case for Blu-ray Disc which is produced with 2160×1080 (2.1 aspect ratio) pixel resolution, combined with an 8-layer High-Grain-Silicon (HGS) format that uses human-eye perception of depth to produce the added illusion of depth to traditional 1080p HD resolution displays. The new resolution is sometimes referred to by the terms 1080p or 1080i (for "interlaced"), and by 720p (for "padded 82138339de
