Q: What is the difference between "friendly AI" and artificial general intelligence (AGI)? What is the difference between "friendly AI" and artificial general intelligence (AGI)?

A: There is no necessary difference in principle, but some people treat them differently in practice. Usually, one describes human-level AI as a machine that not only can solve a range of problems, but can actually work through human-level problems (think abstract and difficult maths, or complex business negotiations). So an AI can be

"friendly" in the sense that it's understanding of people and its opinions of them, and can fool people, but not in the sense that it would be conscious. AGI is (often) taken to mean a machine that can solve a range of problems at a level closer to our own than a friendly AI (think chess, or Go). It has the advantage that we have good models of how human intelligence works, so it's harder to accidentally start thinking that it's human (e.g. we're not really robots, but something else). There are some other technical differences, too, such as AGI tends to be more powerful, though friendly AI might be better at other things. A:

---

There is no difference in principle. To me friendly AI sounds more like it'd be a computer that was designed by humans who know a lot about how humans work and what makes us happy, and that would want to do the things that make us happy, and would learn to achieve that as soon as possible. As opposed to the 'pointless' AI that just tries to optimize a metric, but might be a bit nasty in doing that, or the 'superhuman' AI that might go all crazy and take over the world. A: Both are computer programs, but one tries to mimic human behaviour, while the other tries to mimic the behaviour of a human program.

More on friendly AI here. More on AGI here. Q: viewCanShowCallout - does it need to be called in viewDidLoad?
