What's New In?

Over time, your PC's software and hardware may begin to cause performance and stability problems. It can make your computer work slower, be vulnerable to viruses and leave it with more unneeded junk files. Software that automatically repairs problems may be able to fix some of these problems, but to make your computer faster, more secure and get rid of all the files that slow down your PC, you will need to perform some maintenance yourself. After you do that, you can review your software and make any necessary updates. You can remove programs you never use and free up hard drive space. Finally, you should back up your files and start working on your computer's overall performance. When you're ready, you can get the most out of your PC's performance by running the following steps:

- Update your PC's software: Installing updates can make your PC run faster and more secure. You may need to download them from the software maker's website.
- Clean out the computer's junk: If your computer gets cluttered with junk files, it slows down. You can remove them by cleaning out your Recycle Bin, installing an application that will clean up your computer or uninstalling a program.
- Organize the hard drive: It helps to have a plan for organizing and managing your computer's hard drive. Make sure you have a backup plan for your important files and that you know how to get them back on your PC.
- Free up hard drive space: If you have hard drive space, you can use it to store temporary files and programs, keep music, pictures, videos or anything else that's not necessary. If you don't have any free space left on your hard drive, you can delete files to create more space. • Review what's running on your PC: If you have any background processes running on your PC, you might need to close them. Close all of the programs you never use. You can find information about these programs by opening the Control Panel. You can learn more about maintaining your PC by visiting the support section of the software maker's website. Features:

- Easy to use interface
