Q: Unable to match hostnames and IP addresses with regexp As part of the steps of a fight club, I'm doing some documentation of the target host machines (I'm not supposed to explain this context), and I'm looking to identify who's doing what. The way it works is that I'm parsing the output of route -n to identify what hostname is associated with the IP address given by "IfaceAddress". In order to do that, I use the below reg exp to match everything between the parentheses and assign to an array of regexp: ([^(?)\s]*) After that, I use a for loop to compare each string in the array of regexp with the iface address and see if a match is found. It works, but I want to improve it. For instance, the domain name in hosts file is "example.com", but in route, the hostname is "host.example.com". Why it's not matching? I've changed (?

These files provide 32 high quality shadows and texture and 32 high quality text effects. All are in 256 color depth with 16 bit color (True Color). The included shadows are particularly excellent. They have a whole set of light source types (illumination, emission, spot, etc) with diffuse, specular, reflection and transparency. They come in both high quality and translucent lighting variants. Shadows have clean and sharp edges, and can be used for creating very good shadows and reflections for the eye candy category in your games or web applications. These shadows are unique and can be used only as part of a realistic environment (e.g. in a simulation or a painterly game). Since no real shadows are included in the package, they are perfect for the eye candy category. Textures have 32 high quality 256 color textures that can be used in any graphic software. You can use them as part of billboards, pictures, logos, etc. They have unique light and material variations to make them completely flexible. Textures can be used to create some very cool effects, such as star-field, psychedelic, 3D, silhouetted text, etc. Because no real textured is included in this pack, they are perfect for the eye candy category.
