An electrical machine, such as an electric motor or an electric generator, typically includes a permanent magnet that functions to provide a source of magnetic flux to the machine. As the machine turns, its rotor rotates in a magnetic field established by the permanent magnet. In this way, a machine may be employed to turn work products, such as screws, nuts and bolts, and other articles. Permanent magnets are typically one of two types. Soft magnets are formed by mixing ferrous material, such as iron or steel, with an alloy or compound, such as samarium-cobalt, that provides the magnet with a high magnetic saturation strength. Soft magnets are generally less expensive than permanent magnets that employ rare earth elements, which are sometimes known as rare earth magnets. A rare earth magnet typically includes a plurality of particle cores with a magnetic liquid composition sealed within the cores. The rare earth magnets are a group of elements that include elements from the lanthanide series, i.e., lanthanum to lutecium, and the element yttrium, as well as several transitional metal elements. In general, permanent magnet manufacturers seek to minimize the amount of the rare earth elements in the magnets. Rare earth magnets are expensive and, accordingly, permanent magnet manufacturers reduce their use in favor of the use of cheaper materials, such as samarium. A problem with such magnets is that they are quite brittle. When a permanent magnet is subjected to excessive force, it can break. While a permanent magnet made with the rare earth elements may last for an extremely long time, as long as millions of electrical cycles, a magnet containing only samarium is less resilient. A machine incorporating a samarium-only magnet may thus develop cracks and broken magnets in the rare earth portion of the magnet. Accordingly, there is a need for a soft magnet that is resistant to cracking and failure. Siege of Loerchegg The siege of Loerchegg took place in the early stages of the Italian War of 1499. In 1499, the imperial forces of Holy Roman Emperor Maximilian I advanced on the south of Swabia, capturing the towns of Ostrach (March 17) and Bochlolt. He also captured several castles in the region. However, the imperial forces received significant resistance from the troops of the Landgraviate of Baden-Durlach in the south of the region. The Landgrave Johan the Elder was forced to come to terms on March 28, agreeing to pay a 500,000 gulden ransom for his eldest son Otto and two daughters. The delivery was to take place in Nürnberg on April 17; the same day as the imperial army's departure. The attack on Loerchegg by Landgrave Johan the Elder was prepared against this background. At the beginning of April, a small Imperial force attacked the region of St. Gotthard and Frankenhöfen. They captured St. Gotthard on April 1, but Frankenhöfen had already received its defenders, and there was a skirmish. On April 6, the Imperial army captured Frankenhöfen as well, and on the same day, they besieged Loerchegg. The troops of the Landgrave attacked the fortifications in the north on April 6, but due to resistance from the imperial forces, they were not able to lay siege to it. After the failure of the siege of Frankenhöfen, the Imperial army was forced to break off the campaign, so that its forces could be used against the imperial city of Nürnberg, and after its capture, to offer compensation for the ransom of the Landgrave's eldest son. To bolster Johan the Elder's forces, he sent his son Otto to Moravia in order to seize the town of Radkersburg, which fell to the imperial forces with little trouble.
