LMAE (long and medium anterior segment) method is a new method for assessing the correction of malocclusion. This method is based on cephalometric tracing, instead of the traditional cephalometric radiography. We evaluated the reliability of this new method by studying 30 orthodontic patients with Class II, Division I malocclusion. The lengths of maxillary and mandibular anterior segments, total anterior and posterior segments and of the mandible, and the angle between lower facial third and lingual third of upper incisors were measured. Malocclusion was corrected by Begg-Vanderberg appliance for 12 months. The cephalometric radiographs before treatment and 1 year after treatment were traced using this LMAE method. Intra-examiner reliability was good for anterior segments and the measurements made by this method. The coefficients of variation (CV) ranged from 0.8 to 5.3%. Inter-examiner reliability was also good, and the CV was between 0.9 and 4.9%. The treatment changes were all statistically significant (P less than 0.05). The LMAE method was better than the traditional cephalometric radiography in assessing the correction of malocclusion. The LMAE method has the following advantages: the cephalometric tracing is simple and convenient; it does not need to expose the patients to ionizing radiation; and it requires less time and effort.
